

American Tug 41

One of the pleasantly surprising features of the recently completed Ft. Lauderdale International Boat Show was the amount of interest the boating public had in mid-range size vessels. As you walked down the same dock every day you found that the American Tug 34 ALWAYS had an enthusiastic line of mariners waiting to go aboard. With good reason. Very quietly over the last two years the crew at Tomco Marine has been steadily cranking out these sturdy luxury cruising tugs to an increasingly demanding set of customers. As of December 2002, they had delivered hulls 37 and 38 from their newly expanded facilities.

The other reason the plant was expanded at La Conner was to accommodate the production of the recently announced American Tug 41. After all the success of the 34, you knew that those customers would sooner or later be demanding a larger version and sure enough, when the AT-41 was announced, the first four hulls were immediately snapped up.

There was no reason to stray far from their already successful formula so Tomco Marine simply went back, listened to their customers, had Lynn Senour draw up an all new hull design and then produced the styling and interior themselves. The biggest change is the addition of a second stateroom for guests. This can also be an onboard office space if desired.

The power plant is currently projected to be a single 480hp Cummins Diesel which should power the AT-41 at a top speed of 18.5 knots and allow comfortable cruising at around 14 knots.

Don't worry, we'll do a full review on the AT-41 when hull number one hits the water in early February 2004. This may seem like a long way out but believe me, Tomco Marine is not about to be pushed into delivering the AT-41 any faster. They have this thing about perfection and making sure their customers are totally satisfied. What a concept.
